Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: ...Sometimes a slight hacking cough was accepted as the possible provocation without insisting that this was of sufficient violence to have instigated the emesis mechanically; again this--the vomiting--would occur without any preceding symptom. It was learned that an old naso-pharyngeal catarrh was responsible for this cough which was regarded with indifference for many years, the patient being in vigorous health and at this particular time it could not have been said that it was increased either in frequency or intensity. A physical examination of the patients lungs and heart proved negative, abdominal palpation elicited nothing, not even a tenderness about the gastric region. At this consultation all the usual methods of physical examination were employed about, the abdomen seeking to reveal a possible cause and an examination of the stomach contents after a test-meal with a repetition of the various examinations was suggested, but these were not accomplished because the patient passed into other hands. It might be added that the tongue was relatively clean and that there was no cough except that which occasionally preceded the vomiting. A provisional diagnosis of a gastric catarrh seemed all that could be reasonably assumed, though it was suggested that an incipient malignancy was confronting us. About six weeks ago I again saw the patient, who in the meantime had run the gamut of the doctors and their nauseous drugs and had visited the various health resorts without having found the longed for Utopia to disembarass him of his affection. Without dwelling upon the variety of opinions expressed or the multiplicity of remedial agents employed it would be fair to say that one gentleman at least was positive in a conclusion that carcinoma ventriculi was sappin...
